Alderdice, Elizabeth Winslow. Over the Hill to the White House. New York: Denison & Company, 1881. Poem written for the inauguration.

Green oaks arch gently o'er
The shadowed, winding way,
And still their leaves soft utter
To hear what lovers say.
They hear that the same old story,
Set at the same sweet time,
Told in the ripened autumn,
Sung in the fragrant June.

Now peace reigns o'er the castle,
Culture and highest art;
And out to all in the wide domain
Goes the mother's loving heart.
The honored, castle mother,
Gracious and stately of mien;
As kind to the foreign stranger,
As to princes or crowned queen.

The green Barrowan Highlands!
So picturesque and fair,
With harvesters' happy voices
Floating upward on the air.
Where'er my wandering footsteps
In foreign lands may roam,
That vision will come before me
Of the Castle of Bunkers.

E. W. A.

Grey from their base to summit
They melt in the morning mist,
As sunlight each trace of color
As far in the shade has killed.
Until only the distant outlines
Live in the daylight glow,
That is covering its myriad brilliants
On the dazzling fields of snow.

Away through the white-veiled Highlands
The jingling hordes come,
Tossing their gleamed heads proudly
As the post-touched winter sun,
While their bells ring out a welcome,
Which tells of the goodly cheer,
To be found within the Castle,
This glorious night, New Year.

May the New Year's choicest blessing
On the Castle halls descend;
The quiver of sweet contentment,
Each inmate life attend,
Alike in the green leaved summer,
On the dazzling winter snow,
These loved Bavarian pictures
Will ever in memory glow.
